ASPHALT FROM HERRING! Pennsylvania Threatens to Revolutionize a Great Industry. Asphalt made from fresh herring and shavings is the latest novelty in the chemical is the genius who has discovered this new use for the piscatorial delicacy. Kippered herring, the smoked variety and the fresh fish, have so long been standard dishes on the menu that their use for anything other than as an edible appears almost preposterous. In fact, it suggests the idea that asphalt paving of this variety should be laid on Friday and only used during Lent. cocted by the professor, does not differ in appearance, weight or touch from the natural product. In fact it is almost impossible for an expert to note any dissimilarity. Prof. Day is regarded as the highest au-thority in the world upon the question of some gilsonite. The assistant greeted this assertion with intense surprise, but, as his superior was not a practical joker, he secured the slivers of the forest and the denizens of the deep and eagerly watched the peculiar experiment. Into a cylindrical iron retort were introduced a number of fresh herring and a number of small pieces of fat pine wood. The retort was connected by plaster of paris joints with a short glass tube, and this with a gas pipe four feet long. The latter being placed in an ordinary combustion furnace, the other end of the pipe was connected with a Liebig cold water con-denser. After charging and closing the retort, it was heated by means of gas water and oil, together with a white smoke, flowed from the condenser into the receiver. The oil obtained was lighter than water, of bad oder, and very dark red in color. This oil was then placed in a distilling bulb and heated until about half of it had been distilled away. When the residue was cooled it formed a black brittle solid. This black, polished substance was of the same seeded in obtaining slatenite, another form of asphalt, from fish alone. Although he does not claim any practical value for his new products, the experiments are of great scientific value. It is not necessary to make enormous catches of fish for asphalt purposes, as the natural product can be found in ample quantities. In fact, this summer interest of the Geological Survey department, which has employed him as an expert Eldridge of the geological survey will visit deposits in the near future and forward specimens to Prof. Day for chemical analysis.

asphalt. He received, a few days ago, a specimen of gilsonite, a natural variety of asphalt which exists in large quantities in Utah. The chemist made a careful examination of the product from the Mormon territory. He then asked his assistant, Eugene Learning, to secure him some fresh fish and some pine shavings, as he intended making stoves, which, together with the retort, were surrounded with loose bricks to prevent the loss of heat. The gas pipe was heated to bright redness by the combustion furnace. During the process of the distillation
